Lyssayn 4.0 out of 5 stars I needed to find a film camera that would take good pictures and be as dummyproof as possible. The film autoloads, so Dad and I has confidence that the film is in properly. The buttons on the front zoom in and zoom out so, while it takes him a second to fatfinger which button is which, he's only got 2 options and it's pretty obvious which one he's landed on. It's got a very long cord, so he can wear it around his neck; not stylish, I'll admit, but he's always got it within reach. She is actually a knowledgeable photographer having taken photography courses in school, but wanted a simple pointandshoot that she could use without having to think about fstops and shutter speeds. As I am also a photography fan since my misspent youth, it's common ground for us, and I get to see all of her pictures. I have to say that the camera has far exceeded both our expectations. It does a very respectable job under a variety of conditions and produces sharp, wellfocused, consistent photos.

It is simple to use and the zoom lens is terrific. We have not seen the flash problems that some of the other reviewers have reported. But I think perhaps the best feature of this camera is its portability. It is so small and light and the lens retracts into the body and covers up when the power is turned off that she is able to keep it in her pocketbook at all times. We called the Canon 800 number and were referred to a local authorized repair center to whom we brought it. That was about a week ago. Even though the situation is not yet resolved, I thought it was important to post this update, since I've seen exactly this same problem reported in several of the other reviews here. The camera was not heavily used nor was it abused in the year that my daughter owned it. I am reducing my rating to 4stars because of this. I will update again when we get the camera back from Canon. I was initially disturbed to find that the camera requires DXcoded film. I usually order my film from a mail order supplier and they do not carry DX film which, from what I've been able to discover, means that there is more information bar coded onto the canister. This I could live without. However, the manual tells you that it's possible to use regular film though it may be a little more difficult to load, and furthermore it will always register as ISO 25 not 100 or 200 or 400. I was pretty unhappy about all this. The results were very good in all conditions. Next, we loaded regular Kodak film ISO 200. I could not get the film to load. I placed the reel in with various lengths of film exposed but that didn't help. I tried to depress the shutter button as recommended in the manual, but that did not help. My husband got the film to load on the first try. I believe this is because I had warmed it up for him. Again we took pictures in many circumstances and the quality, surprisingly, was fine. The features offered work well.

I would say the only problem with this camera, as with its predecessor, is a sluggish zoom mechanism. A very good camera at a good price. It does have one though screw in type. If you've read Nick Kelsh's book on photographing babies, this camera has everything you need to make them great. Love it so much, I'm buying another one for a friend. And if you have a little one in the house or know someone who does, this would make a great companion gift with Nick Kelsh's book too. Maybe a shower gift from everybody at work. You won't be sorry! I first used the Canon Sure Shot 85 Platinum on my vacation to Niagara Falls, and I got PLATINUM photos in return. The red eye reduction is nice, although the person must look directly at the camera. I would definitely reccomend this product to anyone. Picture taking has never been so much fun! It can also mean that the film has misloaded. Although this is repairable, its usually not economically viable. As a side note; this is the only camera so far I've reviewed that originally came with factory installed batteries, in both the camera 2CR5, and a couple of CR1220 for the remote, however, the main camera battery still had some power, but not enough to operate it properly. I guess Canon thought that describing the blinking as 4, or 16 times per second would be confusing. Additionally, the camera is fully automatic, with only a couple of flash control options, and unfortunately has no exposure adjustments whatsoever, so let's hope the auto exposure system does a good job; and if not, the camera becomes a nice looking paper weight for your desk. Let's find out now! Autoboy Zoom Super in Japan, and Prima Zoom F in Europe. Owner's manual, a black vinyl carrying case and neck strap. Self timer with Remote control. Real image zoom viewfinder, 84% coverage, 0.41x magnification at 39mm, and 0.83 at 85mm.

Has frame guidelines, autofocus mark, closeup correction marks, green autofocus indicator and red flash indicator lights on the side of the viewfinder; solid green means focus is locked, and you're good to shoot, blinking green means it isn't focused properly. Solid red means the flash is charged and ready. Defaults to ISO 100 when no code is detected. Click for larger images. The end of the zoom lens has a rubber coating around it, and it won't take any filters. The flash zooms with the focal length, meaning it adjusts the dispersion angle accordingly; a unique feature on a point and shoot camera. Doing this ensures the camera doesn't miss focus on foreground clutter and window glass. The viewfinder is clear and bright, but a bit small. The two small lights on the left side of the viewfinder window are; the top one is green for AF confirmation, and the bottom one is red for flash status and shake warning. The DX code reader is at the back of the cartridge compartment, but not visible in this shot. At the back of the lens you'll see a rectangular flat black stray light shield. The film pressure plate is metal, and the film tensioner is spring steel. I see moltoprene spongy light sealing material around the film reminder window, but nowhere else. Although there are marks at 50mm, 70mm and 85mm, you can set the zoom at any length in between. The button below is for flash mode; on, off or slow sync. Both the shooting, and flash modes go back to default when the power is turned off. The two coin cell CR1220 batteries can be replaced on the remote by removing the cover. It's really just for protecting the camera as there isn't any way to carry it around your neck or belt. I guess the loop is for running the camera neck strap through and letting it hang so you don't lose it while taking a snap. Kodak Gold 200 used for all shots. Click for larger images. I think 39mm; seems underexposed slightly.

I see decent background blur, but maybe the focus hit the shoulder instead of the face. Very sharp in the central area, with minor softening along the sides. My copy was probably made close to the end of the run for the model, maybe in the early 1990s, and I was the first one to actually use it. I wish I had it back then for recording my travels and friends, but I was broke, and only had enough money for this one. The Sure Shot Zoom XL has a range of 39-85mm; so it barely hits what I consider wide angle coverage, and seems too restrictive today, but back then it was very common. Also, the camera handles well, and does have some heft to it, but it's still much lighter, and has a smaller footprint than a SLR with zoom lens. The exposures overall were pretty accurate, but I think I'd like at least another stop of light for my taste when using print film. Canon claims the Sure Shot Zoom XL will "detect backlight situations, and adjust the exposure by 2 steps," but my results suggested the feature didn't work very well. I think the camera chooses to protect the highlights by default, maybe as a precaution for slide film that Canon thought would be used more often than print film; however, I haven't tried any slide film yet to confirm my theory. A workaround for this is tape over the DX code on the film canister of either ISO 200 or 400 speed print film, and the camera will default to ISO 100, so in this way you get exposure compensation; I may do that on my next roll. The idea is that you can frame your subject at a certain focal length or magnification, the camera will memorized it, and will automatically frame the subject at the same apparent size using a different zoom length as you change your shooting distance and angle from the subject. This type of gimmick was popular back then, but it's a little confusing to set up, and not really worth it in my opinion, so I guess that's why manufacturers drop it a few years later.

But just between you and me, I'd rather carry this one around for fun. Please turn on Javascript in order to fully enjoy this website. Learn how here. For the best experience on the web. Saying no will not stop you from seeing Etsy ads, but it may make them less relevant or more repetitive. Please

The case and camera are in Pristine shape and the zoom works perfect. Its in better shape than my old babied Minolta camera. I have had all types of experiences shopping on Ebay good and bad. Shop at smittysclue if you dont mind having nothing to complain about. It works well. It makes great pictures. It makes clear pictures. Just point and shoot. Very easy to operate. The same one from when I was young.
